Introduction: Why This Content, for This Group?

The adult No-Gi class brings together students with full physical and motor maturity, which allows for a denser program: longer technical sequences, complete attack systems (rather than isolated techniques), and greater tactical demand, including decision-making under pressure and real-time adaptation during rolling.

Without the gi, much of the game changes: there are no lapels or collars to lock guards or finish chokes, so the program places greater emphasis on control through body pressure (body lock, Russian control), wrestling-style takedowns (single leg, double leg), pressure passing, and the world of leg attacks (Ashi Garami, 50/50, saddle, cross ashi), which are central to high-level No-Gi today.

That's why the year is organized by systems — passing (July), front headlock attacks (August), back control (September), kimura (October), scrambles (November), and the modern leg-lock and dynamic guard game (December) — rather than isolated positions. This structure helps adult students see the connections between techniques and build a coherent game, applicable both in training and competition.

This document serves as a reference guide for the team's instructors: each month is divided into weekly classes, with the techniques to be covered, ensuring that the adult No-Gi class follows a consistent technical progression throughout the year.
